

Visual Story

There is a black double gate and small set of stairs leading up to a big wooden double door to enter the Polar Museum.

There are big statues in the front garden which you can look at.

There is a side entrance with a long ramp and small set of stairs leading up to a wide glass automatic door where you can also enter the Polar Museum.

Inside the Polar Museum, there is a front desk where our friendly volunteers sit. They can help you if you have any questions and tell you more about our Museum.

There are lots of big and small drawers which you can open and look inside.

There are handheld mirrors you can borrow to look at the maps painted on the ceiling of the Memorial Hall.

There are lots of different objects in glass cases that you can look at and read about.

There are lots of fun activity sheets which you can complete or take home with you.

There are two big maps of the Arctic and Antarctic which you can ask to see, touch and feel.

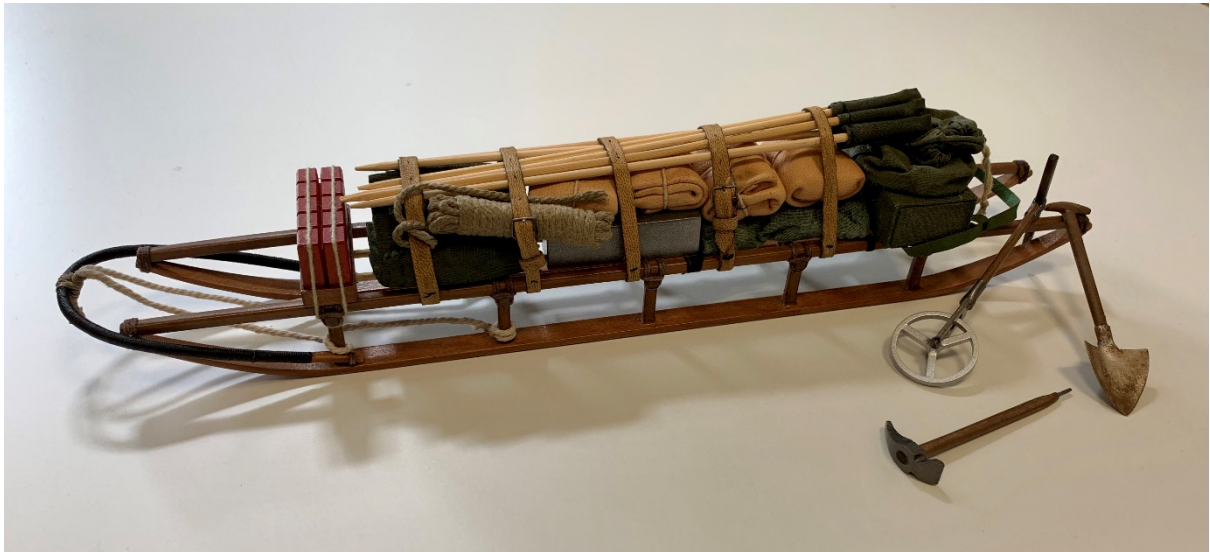

(Please book our maps for use in advance of your visit to avoid disappointment).

There are audio guides for adults and children that you can listen to.

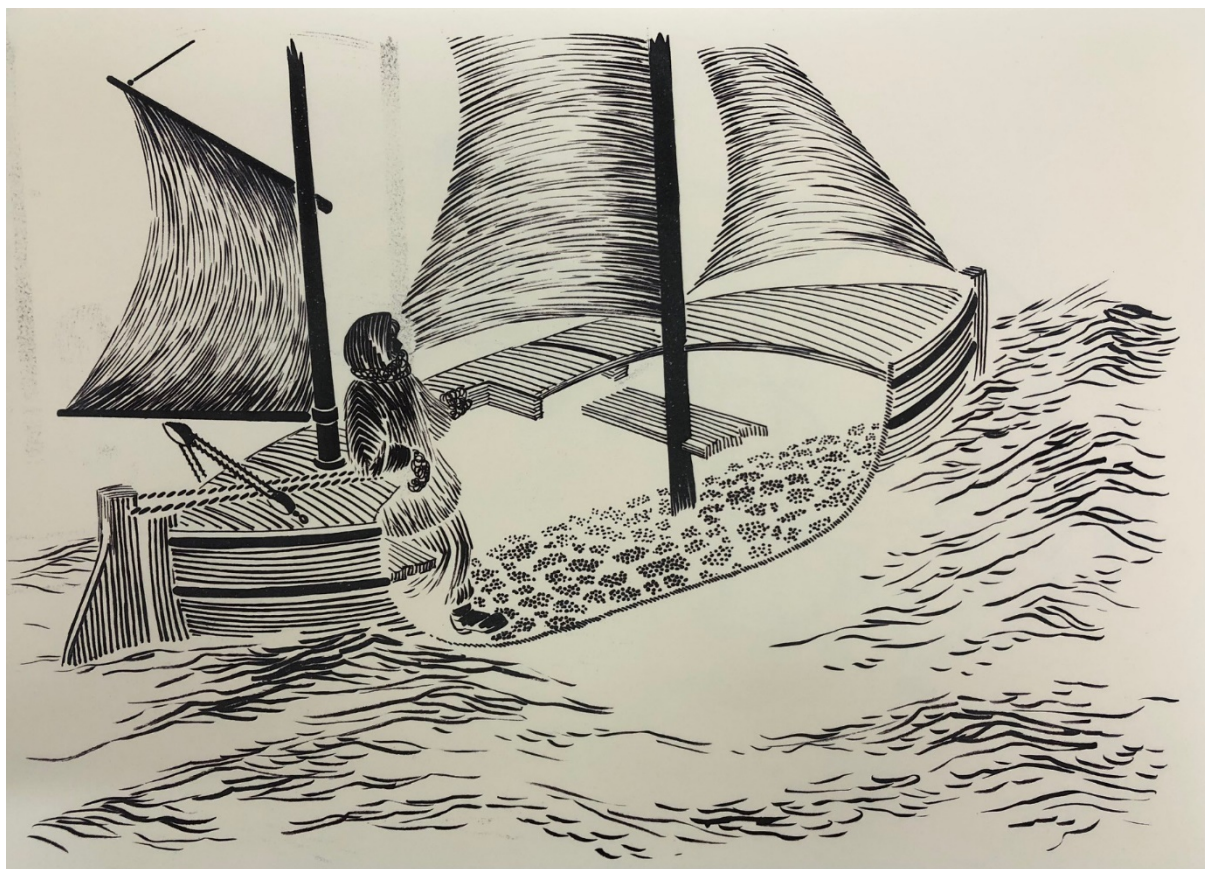

There are special objects which you can ask to see, touch and feel.

There are touch screens that tell you interesting facts and show you lots of pictures.

There are pictures with bumps, dots and lines that you can ask to see, touch and feel.

If you're feeling tired, you can sit on one of our benches in the Memorial Hall.

There is one toilet that is accessible to everyone.

A museum exhibit featuring a purple wheelchair in the foreground. The wheelchair has a large black rear wheel and two smaller front wheels, with a purple seat and backrest. It is positioned on a dark tiled floor. In the background, there are glass display cases containing various historical artifacts and informational panels. The panels include text and images of historical figures and events. The exhibit is well-lit, and the overall atmosphere is educational and historical.

There is a small gift shop where you can buy things to take home with you.

Thank you for reading our Visual Story.
We hope to see you soon!

Scott
Polar
Research Institute